Wie in isländischen Zeitungen berichtet wurde, sind erneut Tonnen von Heringen in der Bucht von Kolgrafarfjörður, am nördlichen Rand der Halbinsel Snæfellsnes zusammengekommen, wo eine ähnliche Menge bereits letztes Jahr und heuer im Winter in die Falle gerieten. 52.000 Tonnen Hering kamen im letzten Winter in diesem Fjord um.

Es wird angenommen, dass sie aus den warmen Gewässern in die kalten flüchten, aufgrund ihres Massenauftretens sinkt aber der Sauerstoffgehalt im Fjord und sie sterben.

Dieses Mal wird man versuchen, die Heringe mit den Lauten von Orcas zu vertreiben.

An die isländischen Fischer erging ein Aufruf, fischen zu kommen aber selbstverständlich können diese nur einen winzigen Teil dieser Massen fischen. Man schätzt, dass es sich um 100 bis 200 Tonnen Hering handelt.

25.000 Tonnen haben einen Handelswert von GBP 18.9 Millionen = USD 29.7 Millionen = EUR 21.9 Millionen, d.h. der letzte Verlust Islands war mehr als das Doppelte dieses Betrages und man fürchtet, er könne nun ähnlich hoch werden.

Wir haben bereits im August über das weltweite unerklärliche Fischsterben geschrieben und haben uns gewünscht, nicht noch einmal einen Artikel dieser Art veröffentlichen zu müssen.

Um nur die letzten zwei Monate unter die Lupe zu nehmen, wird die Liste des Massensterbens von Tieren schon beängstigend. Sehen Sie selbst :

Tons of herring are now trapped in Kolgrafarfjörður, a small bay on the north edge of the Snæfellsnes peninsula, where tons of entrapped herring were killed last winter.

There are concerns that mass death of the fish will occur for the third time but as reported, this previously happened in February and December of last year.

Speculations are that the herring is seeking colder sea to dwell in during the winter, but dies when the oxygen level in the bay drops.

Þorsteinn Sigurðsson, specialist at Iceland's Marine Research Institute, told RÚV that attempts will be made on Monday or Tuesday to scare the herring away with killer whale sound effects.

"We have recordings from the Dolphin Research Centre in Húsavík of the sounds of killer whales eating herring. We'll play these recordings underwater. If it works and it stirs the herring we should be able to use this method to herd it out of the bay," Þorsteinn said.

52,000 tons of herring were killed in Kolgrafarfjörður last winter. 25.000 tons have a value of GBP 18.9 million (USD 29.7 million, EUR 21.9 million, so Iceland's loss during the last winter was more than double of that amount and could be even higher after this new mass herring invasion.

Boats are busy fishing in the bay but they can only manage to catch a small fraction of the herring trapped in the bay. The fishermen estimate there could be between 100 and 200 thousand tons of herring there now.
